TECH TIP OF THE MONTH

Be Careful with QR Codes

QR codes make it easy to open a website, view a menu, pay an invoice, or access information quickly. But because you cannot see the web address before scanning, they can also be used to hide harmful links.

Cybercriminals may include QR codes in phishing emails, text messages, flyers, or even stickers placed over legitimate codes in public spaces. Their goal is often to send you to a fake sign-in page, convince you to download something harmful, or collect personal or business information.

Before scanning a QR code, take a moment to consider where it came from. Were you expecting it? Does it make sense for the message or location? Be especially cautious with unexpected QR codes in emails that claim you need to verify an account, update payment information, review a shared document, or respondurgently to avoid losing access.

After scanning, review the web address before continuing. Look for misspellings, extra words, unfamiliar domains, or anything that does not match the organization you expected. If a page asks you to sign in unexpectedly, close it and go directly to the company's official website or app instead. You can also contact the sender through a known phone number or email address to confirm whether the QR code was legitimate.

If you scan a code and think you may have entered your password or other sensitive information on a suspicious page, change your password right away and contact your IT team. Acting quickly can help protect your account and prevent a small mistake from becoming a larger issue.

Quick rule: Treat every QR code like a link—pause, verify, then proceed.

The Office Is No Longer Just a Place

When people hear someone works remotely, they often picture flexibility, quiet focus, and a short commute. But successful remote work is about much more than where someone opens their laptop. It requires clear communication, intentional teamwork, and a strong sense of connection—even when coworkers are spread across different cities, states, or countries.

In this featured article from our Q4 Pillar Magazine, Pantheon Director of Business Operations Nikki Dulas shares her experience working fully remote and explores what makes a distributed team work well. From morning huddles and Microsoft Teams conversations to shared documentation and virtual water-cooler moments, she shares how Pantheon stays connected throughout the workday.

The article also looks at the realities of working from home. Remote employees still need defined schedules, clear boundaries, and the discipline to stay focused during work hours. At the same time, employers need to create opportunities for connection, collaboration, and professional growth so remote team members feel just as included as those working from a physical office.

Technology makes remote work possible, but relationships are what make it successful. When people have the right tools, communicate clearly, and feel connected to the team around them, "the office" becomes less about a building and more about the people working together.

Read the full article in our Q4 Pillar Magazine to learn more about the experience of the remote worker. Reach out to Pantheon Computers if you would like a copy of the full magazine.
